Agricultural Fairs.

The season of fairs is at hand. The first on the list, both in point of time and importance, is the New England, which is to be held this year at New Haven, Connecticut. Hamilton Park, in which the exhibition is to be held, is abundantly spacious for all the requirements of the Society, and it is understood that no pains or expense will be spared to make the show an improvement on all its predecessors. Immediately following comes our State fair, at Burlington, and County Fair at Shelton.

The Agricultural Fair has been appropriately called the Farmers' Festival, and we look upon it as combining all that is implied in that term with all that is implied in a definition once given by Dr. Loring, of an agricultural society. He said, "I look upon it as in the highest sense an agricultural school, in which all are teachers and all are pupils. All amusement should be subordinated to instruction, and we cannot conceive it possible that any man, woman, or child should attend an Exhibition like those of the New England Agricultural Society without deriving sufficient information to pay for both time and expense, while all the amusement is thrown in free, gratis, for nothing, as the pedlar says. A farmer who, in these days, is unmindful of his best interest as to attempt to run his business on the mere fund of knowledge that he is able to pick up at home, may as well make up his mind to be counted out of the category of enterprising farmers at once, but if he is really a seeker after knowledge of animals or implements there is to place that can at all compare with the Agricultural Fair.

The advantage that the New England society offers in comparison with our state and county fairs is not so much in the number of the articles exhibited as in the circumstance of their coming from widely separated regions and the facility thus afforded of educating the public mind up to the highest standard of excellence. The dairyman, for instance, who desires to breed up his dairy stock may here meet with breeders who have proceeded by widely different methods to perfect their dairies, one in search of the greatest possible amount of milk without any reference whatever to quality, another breeding for a butter stock, and the third for cheese; while light along side he may see another breed that for generations has been bred solely for beef. It is very difficult for the unpracticed eye to embrace all the good points or the unpracticed mind to retain the points embraced long enough to institute just comparisons between animals widely separated, but bring them into juxtaposition and the comparison is comparatively easy.

Another and a greater advantage derived from attendance on the fairs is the attrition of mind against mind. Men acquire ideas and let go prejudices as they see more of one another, and they always appear to good advantage when actively engaged in the investigation of subjects connected with their own material interests.

But we could not conceive any occasion for pursuing this subject did we not know that there are dozens of farmers in every neighborhood who deny themselves the pleasure of attendance on fairs all their days, and, as a consequence, work harder, fare worse, and lie poorer for their unjustifiable self denial.

Jared Dec, of Georgia, has received from Thomas Baxter of Borton, a pair of his very superior chester white pigs. He has also a boar pig, on sale for Mr. Baker, which has not a superior in this county.
